

JOURNAL EXERCISE

I took the 15th (I chose that number at random) word from each journal entry in my main journals from October 7, 1997, to January 13, 1994, and compiled them in four paragraphs (1997, 1996, 1995, 1994). All the words are in chronological order; the only things I added were periods. The capitalization and emphasis were preserved, and periods were added just before capitalized words (not proper nouns) that looked like the beginnings of sentences.

NOTES:

- Number of times "I," "me," "mine," "myself," or "my" appeared: 38 (every eighth word). Less than I expected, really. Hah hah.
- Most common words: "a," "and," "but," "got," "in," "is," "it," "no," "not," "of," "so," "that," "the," "to," "was," "with." It was interesting to note how I was disappointed when I just missed exciting words (like they were 14th or 16th) in favor of another "and" or "the." But I also was relieved when I just missed an embarrassing word in favor of a "the." This exercise actually highlighted how necessary the more boring words are.
- Both "macaroni" and "cheese" appeared in paragraph for 1995.
- "Clear" appeared three times in 1994.
- "Walgreen's" appears all the time in my journals. (?)
- Favorite line (the last one): "...and is is myself I I I been list-making I."
- This is fun to read aloud as if it made sense. You want it to make grammatical sense when you read it.

Much more your OFF believe. Time night behaving though McDonald's.
